Here, Clarke elides the surface of Cold Knap Lake itself with human consciousness. She has been precipitated into this uncertainty and elision through the final shocking denouement to the tale of the child's rescue: 'and watched her thrashed for almost drowning.' Human beings show relief in strange and often disturbing ways.

In "Cold Knap Lake" by Gillian Clarke, the poet's diction helps to reveal how the event described changes from a vivid memory to one that seems less certain. One example to support this is the line, "Or is that troubled memory something else / shadowy ..." (16). The word "shadowy" implies that something is uncertain, or
